Butler did not have a very fair character here, even before the late uncomfortableness came up. In 1861 and 1862 he was one of the most red-bot rebels that ever wanted to kill five Yankees and not get killed himself. At that time he was unknown to fame, except as a member of the Rebel Legislature. Upon the records at Nashville can still be found some of Butler's patriotic speeches, in which he denounced the wicked North, for carrying on the wicked North, for carrying on the wicked war against "Southern rights and Southern honor." He seems to have had a particular spite against the man who wrote rs the chedid Butler, "I kept Jailer's room in a convivint mood, and it in safet the of going upon record at Probably that was commis-, wrapping the jailer's cost about him ical function of going upon record at Probably that was commis-, wrapping the jailer's cost about him ical function of going upon record at the probably that was commis-, wrapping the jailer's cost about him ical function of going upon record at the probably that was commis-, wrapping the jailer's cost about him ical function of going upon record at the probably that was commis-. or."
